Using graph paper and pencil, draw a map of the dungeon. First, select a scale. The scale of a map is the number of feet (length and area) represented by one square on the paper. A common scale is "1 square = 5' x 5' area." For outdoor areas, like the town mentioned above, a 20' x 20' map square is common.

To create a world in Dungeons and Dragons, start by deciding on a scope and approach. If you want a big, sprawling world, start by designing a continent. If you want to focus on the town the characters are in, start there instead. Then, you can start adding towns, states, hierarchies, and political structures.

If you like tactical combat and using a gridded battle map while playing D&D, you may want to draw your dungeon on graph paper, with each cell of the graph representing a 5-foot square. However, I challenge all first-time dungeon makers to just make a flowchart-style dungeon map like the five-room examples in the Nerds on Earth article.
